Fistful of Mercy getting more than a handful of great reviews

"This new Los Angeles-based supergroup unites jam-folk veterans Joseph Arthur and Ben Harper with George Harrison's son, Dhani, who in 2008 released the debut by his band thenewno2. Slightly psychedelic, mostly acoustic and uniformly tuneful, Fistful of Mercy's sound shouldn't surprise fans of any of those acts; nor, for that matter, should the appealingly casual quality of the nine songs on As I Call You Down, which the musicians wrote in three days. (Longtime session drummer Jim Keltner contributed his talents in the studio, helping perhaps to keep the ship afloat.) On "Things Go 'Round," you can hear traces of the Beatles' music-hall whimsy, while "Father's Son" has a down-home country-blues feel. Elsewhere, the instrumental "30 Bones" features violinist Jessy Greene, a regular collaborator of Arthur's who has also performed with Pink and Foo Fighters. But the most memorable cuts here emphasize Fistful's earthy three-part harmonies, as in "I Don't Want to Waste Your Time" and "In Vain or True," both of which exude a rootsy back-porch glow." - Billboard

"Fistful of Mercy's debut album As I Call You Down is a throwback, in a sense, to 60s and 70s style folk music, with pristine acoustics, soothing vocal harmonies and back-to-basics lyrics addressing everything from love to family ties.

The first track of the nine on the CD is "In Vain or True," a wonderful blending of Beatles-ish fervor and Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young-type harmonies, a memorable start to the lucid compilation. The other tracks range from artfully instrumental to delightfully rootsy. "Father's Son" is a crunchy bluegrass, gospel-like tune full of knee-slapping vigor, reminiscent of Paul Simon's Love Me Like a Rock. In contrast, "30 Bones" is a hushed, lush acoustic; deft guitar picking paired with the sweet strains of the violin. "Restore Me" and "With Whom You Belong" are inspirational, resonant songs, capturing the new group's ideal blending of voices. "Things Go Round" is a trip-happy tune, with a sparse, open sound; only a keyboard highlights the in-and-out vocals. One of the most ethereal, entrancing songs on the soon-to-be-released disc is "Fistful of Mercy," an achingly beautiful ballad with Harper carrying the lead vocals and Harrison and Arthur enhancing the haunting melody with their honeyed intoning.

Dhani Harrison, Ben Harper, and Joseph Arthur have created exquisite, sincere songs that are organic in sound and elemental in design, coalesced by fluid rhythms. For a first outing, this power-trio has put together something mellow yet potent, an all-together pleasant aural cocktail." - Examiner.com

Sarah Jaffe shows that she has her share of fans too

"There must be something about Denton, Texas that makes wistfulness a precondition for that town's young songwriters - probably something to do with being so close to the cultural void of Dallas-Fort Worth. Joining notables like Centro-Matic's Will Johnson and Midlake's Tim Smith, 23-year-old Sarah Jaffe's debut, Suburban Nature, plums similarly plangent themes in vignettes colored by little beyond accent-instruments (cello, keys, or harp), a guitar, and stream-lined percussion.

That sparseness puts the focus where it belongs, on Jaffe's expressive voice, which is comfortable spitting out bluesy accusations or whispering intimacies. Jaffe's narratives feature protagonists in various states of emotional free fall. The best example may be the catchy shuffle "Vulnerable," where love's intensity commingles with the emotional high-wire act of opening up. Honesty forms the core of these songs, as when Jaffe's narrator confesses, over swelling cello lines and vibes-like synth shimmers on "Wreaking Havoc," that "we both like pain," or when she wonders, on the march-like "Summer Begg," whether "we can last one more season." Many of these songs are hushed confessions, but the thrumming highway beat that drives the marvelous road trip-chronicle "Clementine" or a twangy rocker like "Watch Me Fall Apart," which builds tension to match its title, lifts Jaffe far above the average café folkie or introspective singer-songwriter.

This is a startlingly assured debut from a young woman who appears to have much to say. Standout Tracks: "Clementine" "Vulnerable" "Watch Me Fall Apart" - BLURT Magazine

"Denton's Sarah Jaffe sneaks in during the first verse of "Before You Go": "My heart pretends not to know how it ends." It's a crusher, but her voice is soft and haunted; she's a singer-songwriter more in the vein of Jana Hunter than Patty Griffin. Suburban Nature, her first LP, lures you in and then creeps you out with its intensity. On "Summer Begg" she purrs softly, "Somewhere someone's listening to the sound of a record spinning," windows open, music on, a scene from a Raymond Carver short story. "Swelling" cuts out of the album's country-folk trot and becomes its own fever dream, calm even when singing: "Are you trying to tell me something with your eyes? All I want to do now is lay down and die." They're tales of quiet desperation, the kind that blow down the sidewalk when you're not paying attention. For a debut, it's one to pay close attention to." - Austin Chronicle
